

Randall Jackson (PhD) is an Associate Professor in the School of Social Work at McMaster University with a joint appointment in the Department of Health, Aging and Society. Originally from Kettle and Stony Point First Nation (Anishinaabe), Jackson explores lived experience among Indigenous peoples living with HIV and AIDS (IPHAs) using Indigenous knowledge, perspectives, and values. Jackson is the Nominated Principal Investigator of, and co-leading with our community partner (CAAN), the Feast Centre for Indigenous STBBI Research. Jackson's program of research explores the use of Indigenous knowledge across diverse topics, including for example, experiences of depression, Indigenous masculinity, Indigenous trans health, two-spirit resilience, and Indigenous peoples living with HIV leadership. Randy is the recipient of a Queen Elizabeth II Diamond Jubilee Medal (2012) for his research work in HIV among Indigenous peoples and a CAHR/CANFAR Excellence in Research Award in Community-Based Research.